Early morning

By John Joseph Sheehy MacSheehy

I have a lot of trouble sleeping.
I sleep very little in my bed.
The full moon troubles me, draining the soul. I sleep, wake up, sleep, wake up, sleep, wake up.
Nightmares thunder through me.
Nightmares
Nightmares
Other times dreams, forgotten dreams, dreams of wonder

I go to the toilet a lot through the night. I keep going back to sleep to sleep.
To sleep
To sleep
Sometimes I'm awake before midnight, otherwise I'm awake at 1pm, 2pm, 3pm.
I hear the birds in their chorus.
Birds singing, singing, singing.
Singing, singing, singing.
I can hear the male blackbird calling.
The crows caw.

Welcome to the Pavement: a magazine for homeless readers

We're a small charity, founded in London in 2005, producing a pocket-sized mag full of news, views and cartoons that helps people in moments of crisis as well as giving info which may be needed to move on. Right in the centre is a list of places to help you.

We believe that sleeping rough is physically and mentally harmful, but reject the view that a one-size-fits-all approach to getting people off the streets works. Each issue we print 8,500 FREE bimonthly magazines written for homeless and insecurely-housed readers in London and Scotland. You can find the Pavement at hostels, day centres, homeless surgeries, soup-runs and libraries.

Help needed

We are always looking for volunteer journalists and photographers to create exclusive content that's written with our readers in mind. We particularly welcome those who've experienced homelessness. Or can you fundraise or donate so we can keep providing the Pavement for free? We also need London volunteers to help with distribution.

A big thank you to our readers and writers.

Resolutions

Around this time of year people begin to make resolutions. The truth is, we can make them year-round. But another grim truth is how promises go unfulfilled by politicians and governments, and that the ability to fulfil these targets and desires are made difficult by systems and forces beyond many people's control.

That's not to say there isn't hope, though. Read Emdad's story on page 12 about the resolve and strength shown by people experiencing homelessness. On pages 18 and 22 Hayley and Rhonagh share details on some incredible community projects, while there are a number of articles tackling the theme elsewhere in the magazine.

Happy new year to all of our readers and here's to a 2026 full of resolutions.

On 13 November, members of the Pavement magazine attended the annual service of commemoration for people who have died while experiencing homelessness, held at a full St Martin-in-the-Fields, London. The service, this year themed 'Refuge', is organised by St Martin-in-the-Fields, The Connection at St Martin's, Frontline Network, Housing Justice and the Museum of Homelessness. Performances on the day included a moving rendition of composer Gavin Bryars' Jesus' Blood Never Failed Me Yet, as well as songs by The Choir with No Name and Streetwise Opera. In total, 100 names were read out at the commemorative service and a further 58 individuals whose names were unknown were remembered. There was also an opportunity to reflect on the people we have lost in the past year who work with the homeless community. Bonnie Williams, Chief Executive of Housing Justice, said: "The service is a poignant reminder of the life-limiting nature of homelessness and the impact it has on both physical and mental health".

Vigil: In early October a record crowd gathered on the steps of St Martin-in-the-Fields, opposite Trafalgar Square in London. They were there to honour and remember the people who died while experiencing homelessness in the UK. The annual vigil, organised by the Museum of Homelessness, coincides with the release of its Dying Homeless project statistics for the year. The project has a simple goal: to number and, where possible, name the people who have died while experiencing homelessness in the past year. According to the latest report, 1,611 people died while homeless in the UK in 2024 – a 9% increase on last year's findings. Each death is verified by a freedom of information request, coroners' report, charity or family member.

CHAIN reaction

New figures from the Combined Homelessness and Information Network (CHAIN) quarterly report, released in October, have shown that between July and September 2025 an average of 23 people every day were forced to sleep rough for the first time in London. The data makes dismal reading, with a reported 759 people living on the streets of the capital continually through July to September 2025, an 11% rise on last year's figures over the same time period. Overall 4,711 people were recorded as sleeping rough in London in July to September.

The housing crisis

For the year 2025-26, England will sell eight times more council homes than it built the previous year. Analysis in the i paper has found that an estimated 18,500 council homes will be sold off in 2025-26, in contrast to the 2,260 built in 2024-25. Research by the thinktank Common Wealth highlighted that since 1980, 2.4m council homes have been sold off under right to buy, at a discount that Common Wealth calculated was valued at £194bn, accounting for house price appreciation, with 41% of these homes now belonging to private landlords. In the late 1970s, council homes in England accommodated about 30% of households. The figure is about 6% today, an 80% decline. In 1979, Margaret Thatcher ran for prime minister on a manifesto which included introducing a new Housing Act. In 1980, Thatcher's Conservative government passed the Housing Act 1980, which gave people the right to buy their council homes. Common Wealth called for expanding "right of first refusal" powers in its November report, powers that enable local authorities to be the preferred buyer when ex-social homes and private rental homes enter the market.

Bank on it

A project run by Shelter, the government and HSBC to help people experiencing homelessness open bank accounts, will be expanded to include Lloyds, NatWest, Barclays, Nationwide and Santander. Commonly, people require a bank account to apply for work and rental accommodation in the UK, which can often be an issue for people experiencing homelessness. The scheme aims to secure people a bank account and provide additional support, such as accompanying individuals to face-to-face meetings at local bank branches. Since the pilot scheme launched in 2019, 7,000 accounts for people experiencing homelessness have been opened with HSBC, reported the Guardian in November.

Buenos Aires bulletin

The number of people experiencing homelessness in Buenos Aires, Argentina, is increasing at an alarming rate. According to municipal data, which is widely regarded as an underestimate, at least 4,522 people were living on the capital's streets in May 2025, a 38 % increase on the number in November 2023. Charities and homelessness campaigners point to the election of Javier Milei as president in December 2023, whose plan to tackle dizzyingly high inflation has been to implement a devastating austerity programme, as a cause. According to the Guardian, about 200,000 formal jobs have been lost, household debt is on the rise and there has been no improvement in living standards since Milei took power.

Calling security

Transport for London (TfL) spent £113,365 on hiring a security firm – believed to be MEC Security – to prevent people sleeping rough on Park Lane, between July and September 2025. London Centric revealed in October that security had been deployed to patrol the area and discourage people from sleeping rough there. In May 2025, Westminster City Council won a court order to remove a large encampment on Park Lane near Hyde Park Corner.

The strip where people made the encampment is in the Westminster district but is actually managed by TfL. TfL would not say for how long security will patrol the area.

Drawing on its work supporting people in their recovery from addiction, the People's Recovery Project aimed to highlight the creative output of its community members, with an array of performances and artworks, including spoken word, music and installations.

£36.5m

provided to London councils by the Department for Housing, Communities and Local Government, reports the BBC.

Londoners are homeless, according to London Councils.

Funding boost

An additional £1.6m in funding has been provided by the Scottish Government for the next year to tackle homelessness. According to Scottish Housing News, the majority of the funding (£1m) will go towards Discretionary Housing Payments, which help people move from temporary accommodation into settled homes. About £100,000 will be added to an emergency fund for outreach workers to use to help people sleeping rough. The extra funding was announced at Scotland's Annual Homelessness Conference in Perth, in late October.

Bad reviews

A Glasgow Evening Times story published in November detailed Glasgow City Council's legal troubles around homelessness. Since April 2025, the council has had 2,365 threats of judicial review, challenging the council's use of unsuitable temporary accommodation for people experiencing homelessness. In these cases, people have been placed in unsuitable accommodation for more than seven days, or the council has failed to find suitable alternative accommodation. Of these threats, 31 made it to court, although these were resolved before any orders had to be made against the council.

Obituary

On 3 September, Cyrenians, a Scotland-based charitable organisation providing services focusing on homelessness prevention, shared the deeply sad news that Viki Fox had passed away. Viki had been at Cyrenians for more than eight years, first as a volunteer and later as a full-time staff member. Some of her achievements at Cyrenians include her recent management of the Women's Recovery House services, as well as committed advocacy for recovery and trauma-informed practice in homeless services. It was while working at Cyrenians that Viki learned about the Pavement magazine. Over a number of years, Viki produced powerful articles exploring her experience of homelessness and substance use. A tireless advocate for homeless people, Viki also worked regularly with Homeless Network Scotland, St Martin-in-the-Fields and was a member of the Board of Trustees at Crisis. Viki will forever be remembered as a wonderfully kind, deeply empathetic and compassionate person, who brought all of these incredible qualities into her work with the homeless community. We were lucky to know her and share her words with you.

Photo gallery: A photography group of residents at The Salvation Army's Strathmore Lodge Lifehouse in Dundee held an exhibition in October, showcasing the incredible work participants in the group produced. The group was given cameras in 2024 and tasked with capturing the city from their own perspective. In October 2025 the results, featuring mostly film and some digital photography, were put on display at Dundee Central Library. The exhibition, Look Out!, was open for two weeks from 9 October, with free entry for visitors. Ricky, a resident of Strathmore Lodge and member of the photography group, stressed the enjoyment of the project in a press release: "My favourite thing was going out on photo walks. Enjoying the sunshine and ending up with good memories that we could print."

8,771 people living in temporary accommodation in Glasgow in October, up from 8,170 in January 2025, according to figures printed in the Glasgow Times.

2,293 people staying in hotels and B&Bs, a 26% increase on January 2025. This type of temporary accommodation cost local authorities £29,671,439 between 1 April and 9 October, figures obtained by the Scottish Tenants Organisation reveal. ■

Resolutions and rays of hope

The turn of the year is a time of resolutions. Many people experiencing homelessness enter the new year with resolve and hope. By Emdad Rahman

Every year as the clock ticks towards midnight on New Year's Eve, most of us start scribbling resolutions. We swear we'll run more, eat less, sleep better and phone that distant cousin in Luton. But for many homeless friends, the rough sleepers, the families tucked away in hostels, or the people quietly sofa surfing, resolutions take on a very different meaning.

For so many, it's not about joining a gym or learning Italian. It's about survival. It's about making it through the coldest months with dignity intact and hope still flickering. When you're living day-to-day, a resolution can be as simple as: "I'll keep warm tonight," or "I'll get that housing appointment tomorrow." These are goals forged not from luxury, but from grit.

Back in October, I met a wonderful group of parents, teachers and pupils who had made their own resolution: to support those in need through their school's annual harvest collection. Their enthusiasm was contagious and when I saw the sheer scale of their generosity, I struggled under a mountain of tins, pasta and tea bags. Their kindness helped me top up supplies for a Emdad on outreach in east London.

© Emdad Rahman

local foodbank dedicated to helping homeless people and also fuel my own winter street outreach for rough sleepers. That's the kind of resolution that keeps people alive, fed and connected.

Resolutions matter because they offer focus and light at the end of the tunnel. For people on the streets, that light can be faint, but it's there. For homelessness organisations and outreach volunteers, resolutions are the compass that keeps the mission true: be consistent, be kind, be present. It's about turning hope into habit, one act at a time.

Typical resolutions come and go like buses in the rain. We've all broken one before February and usually while eating cake and pretending it's fruit.

But for those struggling, keeping resolutions is hard when every day is unpredictable. You can't plan to "get fit" when you've slept on a bench. You can't "save money" when you don't have a pound to your name.

Winter, with all its frost and festivity, is a great time to reflect. There's something about shorter days and longer nights that makes us think more deeply. It's the season of truth and the time to acknowledge what's gone wrong and what we can still make right. The run up to Christmas magnifies everything. While families hang fairy lights, many of our homeless friends are just trying to stay visible... and alive.

This year, volunteering near Canary Wharf, I've seen how tensions have risen. The protests outside the Britannia Hotel over the summer became hijacked by those who used the moment to spread hate and division. Racism, verbal abuse and hostility towards both homeless people and volunteers have all increased. What's tragic is how these actions damage real community efforts and frighten away those who genuinely want to help.

One thing I've learned is that compassion is not seasonal. It's not something we switch on in December and pack away in January with the tinsel. The best resolution we can all make, regardless of status, postcode, or profession is to stay kind. Because kindness is what fuels the world's volunteers. We're not superheroes. We're ordinary people who just refuse to walk past suffering without stopping.

Volunteers make the UK tick. They're the heartbeat of our cities, the bridge between hopelessness and hope. Whether it's handing out soup, running foodbanks, sharing books from a bicycle, or simply listening without judgment: every small act matters.

So as the year ends, take a quiet moment. Reflect. Reset. Resolve. Whether you're in a warm home, a hostel, or beneath the city skyline, the power of resolution lies not in what we promise but in what we actually do.

A short poem by Emdad on this issue's theme of Resolutions.

Resolutions of the Street

Cold nights, brave hearts, a promise to keep

Hope walks beside those who barely sleep.

Through wind and frost, compassion will bloom

For even in darkness, kindness makes room. ■

Déjà vu

On the illusion of choice and how the energy industry encapsulates so much wrong with the UK. By André Rostant

The British climate is getting consistently milder, which is of little consolation to those dying from the cold in their homes, among whom over 4,900, many elderly, did not survive the 2022/23 winter. Nor is heating the sole issue: research by the Tressel Trust raised the spectre of 14.1m people in the UK experiencing food insecurity in 2024. Median UK private rent is £16,248, while median UK take home pay is £29,500. By way of distraction, we are offered a pseudo choice of which company we want to oversee our freezing, from among a small select cartel...

Déjà vu

St Fergus, spires twinkling, extracts gas for Scottish Power that kettles might keep whistling in every home at every hour. Over the Channel at Gravelines the nuclear reactors broil. Across our country, wind turbines wave goodbye to gas and oil. You may object, “I live in Hackney, what has this to do with me; why should I care what happens in Scotland, or over the sea?” Then one day your snazzy ringtone heralds a caller who will enquire, “With your high bill, might you wish to change your energy supplier?” This is the happy morning you are presented with the chance to have your boudoir lit by Electricité de France. You can turn your boiler tartan, Scottish Power will make it so. With this new deal so much cheaper, can you possibly say no? Naturellement, once you acquiesce, as fast as the French are able they will start off from Dunkirk with a pretty new copper cable to roll out under the channel, up the Thames and Barking Creek, and convey to you the sparkling Gallic energy you seek.

Not to be outdone, in Aberdeen folk will throw their cabers down, they will set to digging trenches and laying new pipe from the town, through Aberdeenshire, Angus, Northumberland, but they will pause at York for crustless sandwiches, tea, balm cakes, crumpets and small talk. With renewed zeal they will hustle their pipeline to complete until by way of Tottenham Hale, they have burrowed to your feet. So, when you toast your muffins in your Caledonian grill, romantic Highland dreaminess will give you an extra thrill. That same ringtone will tempt you with a new mobile provider, with zettabytes and yottabytes, with bandwidth ever wider. When you succumb, turn off your phone, look up into the night where you will see that especially for you they have launched a satellite.

The Northern Lights dance as poor Scots lie freezing in their beds; the shadow of St Fergus gas plant falls on winter dead. Each year all o'er Britain's sceptred isle, nearly 5,000 die for want of heating, many alone, most old, most wondering why. Though ever in hot water, Andrew, sacrificial anode of the Royal Family still finds the time to summer nearby at Balmoral, with 50,000 acres to go hunting, shooting, fishing. A lifestyle few could e'er afford, but not for want of wishing. While up the road, Trump cheats cheerily on one of his golf courses; that's when he's not at Turnberry riding on his many horses. Yes, the people who own half of Scotland could all fit in a 747; this circumstance differs only slightly for residents of Devon. Over the whole UK, 1% own 70% of a land in which wealth inequality has grown by half in the last eight years: it's out of hand. We reel, dazzled by the cup and ball trick of consumer choice. A lot of us have come to think nobody listens to our voice.

Want to know what is going on? Just three publishers you will find control 90% of UK print reach and nearly half of what flows online. They ensure that daily we are regaled with 20 brands of breakfast oats, and those same reports lean heavily on scrutinising little boats. Go climb up lampposts with your flags, paint roundabouts red white, and haunt hotels where huddled migrants cower in confused fright. Chant the old refrain, that garbled mantra of some "native" revolution. Sadly nothing that you do comes even close to a solution. Those migrants don't own shares in British Gas; nobody can because, like council housing sold and not replaced that is now in landlords' hands, the democratisation of shareholding was an outright con. Somebody tell Sid most of our profitable public assets are now gone. The hands of friends of friends and corporations grasp on and on...

Though of late it barely snows, it rains a lot, which makes me wonder why we pay so much for water that simply falls out of the sky. As Tressel wrote, if all the air could be contained by a company, they'd charge us at the market rate, so enjoy breathing while it's still free! ■

Community service

Learn about the project in York putting people experiencing homelessness at the centre of its mission. By Hayley Johnson, a team member of Lived Insights

What is Lived Insights?

Lived Insights, established in 2023, is a Community Interest Company (CIC) based in York, led by Astrid Hanlon and Miles Goring.

Having both faced homelessness, addiction and mental ill health, Lived Insights now uses those experiences to make a difference.

“We felt our voices were not heard at a painful time,” says Astrid. “Now, we want to make sure nobody else feels invisible. Change happens when people with lived experience are listened to.”

The CIC’s goal is to ensure York’s support services listen to the people who use them, making help more relevant, effective and compassionate. At Lived Insights, we believe those who have faced tough challenges know best what needs to change. We listen to their stories, share them with decision-makers and make sure their voices shape services that work.

Our work

We work on housing, health and social welfare projects. In the ‘York Housing Resettlement Review’, we interviewed over 100 people to understand the challenges of navigating homelessness services and helped the council design services that better meet people’s needs.

With local partners, we helped shape York’s Drugs and Alcohol Strategy by drawing on feedback from people in recovery. Their personal experiences with the services highlighted what works, what doesn’t and what matters most.

For the ‘Food Insecurity Project’, we partnered with the community, involving people connected to food provision schemes as co-researchers. By listening to their experiences, we were able to propose improvements to better address food insecurity.

Community café

Beyond research, we create spaces for communities to connect. Our weekly drop-in community café at St Denys, Walmgate provides a welcoming, safe environment for people to share stories and experiences. We also run working circles that bring community groups and local authorities together to drive meaningful change, ensuring services are designed with people, not just for them.

For those who want to get involved, opportunities include joining working circles or contributing as a community researcher. Every story shared and perspective heard brings us closer to fairer, more compassionate support systems across York.

"Support systems are fractured. That's why we do the work we do and why I'm proud of my involvement," says Miles.

What's next?

We're excited about what's ahead. Upcoming projects include partnering with Healthwatch York and members of the York Poverty Truth Commission on a lived experience research project to strengthen the local welfare safety net and delivering lived experience training for the Swift programme – a North Yorkshire initiative offering advice, support and opportunities for migrants, including asylum seekers.

We aim to grow 'Roundhouse Connection' to build a mental health lived experience network and gather more insight into food insecurity across North Yorkshire.

We are guided by a simple belief: those who live it know it best and they should lead change in their own communities.

The community research café in session. © Lived Insights

Get involved

Lived Insights provides a range of services to people in York. Some of the work it is involved in includes: community engagement; training; research; working circles and a community research café open from 1–3pm every Monday at St Denys Community Hub, Walmgate, Y01 9QD.

Winter ready

Top tips from the Groundswell team on how to best prepare for the cold winter months

Spoken from experience

Groundswell staff with experience of homelessness highlight the essentials.

- Keep dry and try to keep warm
- Get vaccinated for flu and Covid-19
- Keep engaging with services
- Let people know what you need
- Find out where local services are.

More tips from Groundswell

- Register with a GP and talk to them if you have a health problem (it is free to register and you don't need a permanent address)
- If you are sleeping rough, ask a service you are connected to about SWEP, the Severe Weather Emergency Protocol. You have the right to additional assistance if you are sleeping rough.

Groundswell exists to enable people who have experience of homelessness to create solutions and move themselves out of homelessness – to the benefit of our whole society. Our vision is of an equal and inclusive society, where the solutions to homelessness come from the people with experience of homelessness.

A new book focuses on a recovery project in prison and the processing of trauma. By Denise Harrison

Earlier this year I asked nine men in prison if they'd like to write a book. Which sounds like a bit of an ask to be fair, given that for many prisoners, expectations are low and opportunities like this rarer than rocking horse shit.

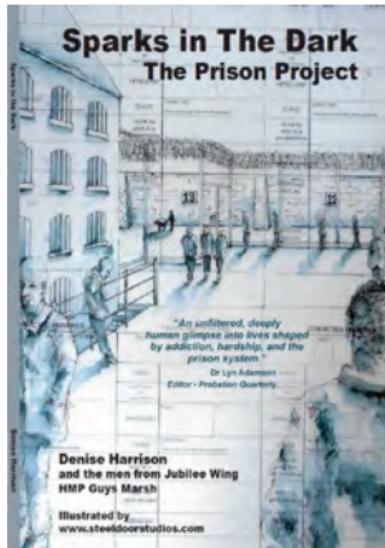

Luckily for them, my bar's set a little higher.

I also have a brilliant publisher who agreed to roll with the idea when I pitched it – and the full support of HMP Guys Marsh who introduced me to these men in the first place. This meant that for these guys at least, this book was destined to be more than just a pipedream.

Over the course of the next 12 weeks the book began to take shape and, as word spread and confidence grew, more and more men asked to join the project. Men who showed up. Men who dug deep and men who absolutely and without exception bared their souls and have done themselves proud.

The book is a mix of hopes and haunts, poetry and prose and I only hope that you love it half as much as we do.

We've decided to call it "Sparks in The Dark", because this book is living proof that good things can come out of the crappiest conditions and the shittiest of situations.

So if you believe in second chances; if you've ever wanted to understand what transformation looks like from the inside out; if you've ever needed hope that change is possible, then this book is for you.

Scratch that

A volunteer at Arts & Homelessness International's first Scratch Night explains what the event is. By Rhonagh O'Donnell

In mid September 2025, I was lucky enough to volunteer on the first ever Scratch Night, hosted by Arts & Homelessness International (AHI), in collaboration with One Roof ODAC.

Arriving at the multipurpose Old Diorama Arts Centre (ODAC), there's a warm, relaxed welcome from the second you enter the door. The place feels very alive.

The Drummond Street Artists group has created the most vibrant, compelling exhibition in the foyer, which ran up to 18 October. All the paintings were for sale – and 100 % of profits go directly to the artists, some of whom I had the joy to meet at the Scratch Night.

The centre itself has fantastic facilities and helpful, fun staff. The core AHI team: Matt Peacock, Samra Said and Katie Langford, instantly make you feel at ease. It was great to get stuck in.

This Scratch Night gives people with lived experience of homelessness the chance to try out any creative work in progress. There's no pressure to have something polished before performing. The bare bones of ideas, in any medium, are welcome.

It's a place to witness – and be part of – some incredible creativity.

What, where and when

What: Arts & Homelessness International, working with One Roof ODAC, is running free, welcome-to-all 'scratch nights' where people with lived experience of homelessness are invited to workshop artistic projects they are working on. These can range from spoken word recitals, to interpretative dance.

Where: Scratch Nights will be held at Old Diorama Arts Centre, 201 Drummond Street, London NW1 3FE.

When: The next Scratch Night is scheduled for 27 February 2026. Dates and times for future Scratch Nights can be found on the ODAC website: olddiorama.com or by emailing samra@artshomelessint.com

It's a place to chat (if you feel like it), enjoy some food and meet some like-minded souls.

The joy is, you can contribute as little or as much as you like, either as an audience member or a participant.

Host David Tovey welcomed a number of performers who had signed up ahead of the event. More were inspired on the spot to take part. The spirit of connection in the room was special.

After each person shared their piece, Calum Perrin (an Associate alumni of AHI) led informal feedback chats in a supportive structure.

Calum used something called Critical Response Process as a guide, a feedback method developed by artist Liz Lerman. The idea is it motivates the performer to go and take their next steps in developing their work. It's relaxed, refreshing and really useful.

Philip Bayes performed a monologue about housing. He delivered it in the style of a speech to the House of Commons. It was brilliantly detailed and based on lived experience. It's a piece you hope will get heard by those who can enact change.

Alain English performed some excellent new poetry, with powerful physicality.

Nell Hardy, Founder of Response Ability Theatre, led her co-creatives in what was unbelievably their first time performing the opening song to their next play: COMPLEX. The harmonies were mesmerising.

ODAC's keyboard was put to wonderful use by Dr Mehdi, whose first composition began as a piece of classical music, developing into a song. He sang in Farsi, letting us know the meaning behind the lyrics afterwards.

A number of other artists spontaneously performed new poetry and music – including a very honest, topical poem written only that morning.

The evening culminated in a merry jam session, which left us feeling on a high.

The strength of community was deep. It was an important evening, full of life, light, creative expression and good chats.

The AHI x One Roof ODAC will now be a regular event on the calendar – trust me, you won't want to miss it.

Sharing and caring

How sharing his experiences has helped our writer recognise and work through events and trauma from his past. By Mat Amp

Over the past few years, I've talked and written a lot about the stuff that used to torment me. As a result it has become increasingly easy for me to share issues that spent years trapped inside my subconscious, fueling its nightmares with the sharp double-barrelled whiplash of shame and regret.

But the process of writing about the difficult shit I have been through, as well as having an encouraging and unjudgmental forum to share it through, has helped me turn haunting issues into experience. It's been transformative.

Instead of continuing to be paralysed by the fear and shame that impacted my life in the wake of experiencing homelessness, I have confronted what has happened in my life by talking and writing about it.

Because my parents died when I was young, being homeless was something that I dreaded. I always knew that there was no safety net for me. There was no family home to fall back on and the bank of mum and dad was effectively closed.

And of course, losing them inflicted a lot of trauma on me. A lot of trauma that, until recently, didn't just remain untreated and unresolved but, to a large extent, unrecognised.

Looking back on things now, a bit of grief counselling would probably have helped, but this was the 1970s – a time when traditional communities had started to dissolve but progressive therapies had yet to develop.

And when I found myself orphaned at the age of 17, I was living in this country, somewhere I didn't grow up or have a network of family and friends. Without a penny or a place to live, I was fortunate enough to connect to the squatting scene, which proved a massive safety net for me, as it was for so many people back then.

To the average Daily Mail/Sun/Telegraph/Express reader (basically everyone who didn't either read the Guardian or the Socialist Worker) squatting was tantamount to home invasion by hippies. Drip-fed by the voices of privatisation, many people came to view squatters with a twisted kind of envy. Free housing? How dare they?

To me, squatting was a coalition of creative types, abused kids and all sorts from all backgrounds, which, in a country divided hard along class lines, was what I'd call a successful social experiment.

This is what I loved about the UK at the time. The numerous DIY cultures during the late '80s and '90s, magnified by the mass downing of E's, spawned a culture of connection that meant for a while it became cool to be kind.

I started to find an identity in that culture and I loved London because, as a mixed-race kid, I felt like I belonged.

There was so much about the place and that culture I loved but I got lost in getting high. We put on parties where everyone got high, I bought a house with the money I got from other people getting high, while some of those people would come to get high or buy stuff to take away in order to get high somewhere else.

Some of that drug use was straight-up fun but some of it was what we would now call self-medication.

I would never have started healing from the traumatic experience of losing my parents if it wasn't for the therapeutic embrace of drugs like LSD, Ketamin and 'shrooms and of course the DMT. Even the mainstream world is starting to wake up to the efficacy of tripping our tits off as a means of treating depression and trauma.

But the thing about self-medication and where it goes horribly wrong is addiction. That's when the drugs you do to expand your mind like LSD, mushrooms, ketamin and DMT meet the narcotics like smack and crack.

Sometimes though, I think smack gets a bad ride. A fellow heroin addict once said to me "we don't have a drug problem mate, what we have is a money problem." And there is a lot of truth in that. People who use narcotics but still manage to successfully go about their lives, will often take great pleasure in telling us that they are a functioning addict, you know, like they are really clever. What they actually mean by this is that they have ready access to the poison of their choice. And so it was for me. Whilst I had plenty of money my heroin addiction wasn't really a problem. In fact, in some way it was helping me to deal with a world that I often found difficult to navigate. I was a functioning addict, but when I lost everything I became a junky.

You know the old adage, what goes up must come down and so it was. When, after 25 years, I finally came down, I fell fast. And it was not in anybody's description or definition a smooth or easy ride. Dude, it was proper bumpy as fuck.

At times, it has been hard to accept that I lost everything. Regret is a motherfucker, though, and if you can find a way of feeling different about the difficulties in your past and what those difficulties are costing you now, then grab it and hold on.

Tracey's memorial. © Sheryle Thomas

► For me, I hold on to the storytelling. I love thinking about my problematic past openly and writing or talking about the way it makes me feel. I love it when people read what I've written and comment on it. The things I generally write about in this magazine and things that we are traditionally encouraged to hide from others because we are repeatedly told that they are not things to be proud of.

But I'm not showing off. I'm sharing them for a host of other reasons and anyway, I don't think they are things to be ashamed of either. ■

In loving memory

by Sheryle Thomas

Late in 2025, I was invited to a memorial service to celebrate the life of Tracey O'Brien.

The local community had gathered around together to light lanterns and to plant a tree. A local resident said Tracey was amazingly and inspiringly positive and kind.

It is always a tragedy when a life is lost through homelessness, but the comfort in this memorial service was that she was well-loved and respected in the community and will be truly missed.

The Man Who Walks Through Smoke

by Joseph Hickman

He was born beneath a roof that forgot how to sing, its rafters sagging with unshed rain.
Silence raised him –
a cold nurse with splintered hands – and fed him shadows for supper.

His childhood was a locked orchard;
the trees bore fruit,
but every apple bruised itself in falling.
Touch became a language of ghosts,
and trust was a candle trembling in the wind.

In his teenage years he chased the reflection of warmth in other faces,
but love, for him, was always a mirage:
a well that turned to dust
as soon as he knelt to drink.
He kissed like a drowning man
clutching mirrors,
cutting his lips on the need to be seen.

At 18 he opened his veins to the night.
Liquor and powder wrote hymns where his blood should have been.

He danced with strangers
in the hollow between heartbeat and oblivion, each one-night stand a prayer to forget the name he carried.

Now, in the dim hour between yesterday and never,
he sits among his ruins.
A man built from echoes,
his reflection fractured into a thousand silvers.
Identity drifts through him like smoke through the ribs of a broken house.

He asks the dark, "Is there still light in me?"
and somewhere, deep within,
a seed: small, stubborn,
still dreaming of green,
turns over beneath the ash.

For even scorched earth remembers
the shape of what once bloomed.
And dawn, though late,
always finds the courage to touch the burnt horizon.

One morning,
he finds a feather caught on his windowsill –
white, soft, trembling
as if it, too, had survived a storm.
He does not know why he keeps it,
only that it hums
with something like forgiveness.

Days stretch into cautious hours.
He learns to breathe
without apology.
The bottle gathers dust,
its mouth a mute witness to the quiet work of healing.

In the mirror,
his eyes begin to thaw.
Ice melting into water,
water remembering the sea.

He walks beneath trees again,
hearing their whispers:
“You are not your scars.”
Their leaves fall gently on his shoulders,
like hands that do not want to hurt.

He does not yet call it redemption.
He calls it trying.
He calls it waking up without flinching.

And in time,
when the night presses close,
he no longer hides.
He lights a single match,
holds it in his palm,

and watches how even the smallest flame
makes the darkness
step back.

John Coltrane

by Chris Bird

Midnight glimpses round,
Smoking down,
Dripping from his skin comes the shade,
The cigarette haloes blow away,
And the saxophone glistens,
Like a sharp smile of joy.

He breathes,
Cool as dusk, soft as ashes,
Blowing crystal, glinting, scalding,
Streaming against drumbeat pour.

New night sky colours flowing,
Riot blossom of light,
Scattering jade and turquoise.

And the man,
Like a statue in spellbound blue,
Just looks,
Silent and distant,
As the cloudy moon.

A load of bother

Time-travelling detective O'Haggis embarks on a trip to the near future, where totalitarianism and pre-loved orgasms for sale mark a troubled era. Story by Chris Sampson

Disclaimer: Any similarities to any near future that Britain may experience are purely coincidental. We hope!

"Roll up! Roll up! Orgasms! Get yer lovely second-hand orgasms here!"

Well, that's something you don't hear every day, thought O'Haggis. He was at The Ejaculatorium, a black market bazaar where escaped orgasms came (no pun intended) to rest and recuperate before their vintage experiences were sold to modern, 21st Century genitalia.

The peddler continued: "This one is so old, it's said to be one of Lord Byron's!"

"Ew!" O'Haggis winced. "Didn't he sleep with his own sister?"

"More than likely, knowing the gentry," the peddler admitted. "But this orgasm dates from his pre-incest days. Honest..!"

O'Haggis shuddered. The Chronology Protection Agency™ operative knew better than to buy pre-loved orgasms from black market vendors, no matter what claims were being made for them.

O'Haggis' latest mission was to 2032 and, now there, he turned his back on the filthy salesman and secreted himself in an alleyway, to get his bearings and reflect on info vital to understanding what was happening if this was a story, for example. It's called exposition, he recalled, helpfully.

He thought-explained that three years had passed since New Labour had lost the 2029 General Election. Reform UK had swept to power on loud promises of ending migration to the UK – with lots of quieter plans against other minorities hidden in the small print of their manifesto.

Now, the party had begun deporting anyone with anything approaching a foreign-sounding name. And so even leader Farage had been ousted, and was forcibly extradited to Belgium, where his ancestors hailed from.

His replacement was Clarkson, once sacked for racism by his former BBC employers. His first diktat as Prime Minister was that the Beeb be forced to carry advertisements, his second to scrap the licence fee, and his third that it must, by law, show nothing but repeats of Top Gear on BBC4 ad infinitum. The intelligent programmes that BBC4 had previously shown were now banned, its archive celluloid footage incinerated, along with books by authors disapproved of by the state.

Migrant crossings were now unheard of, since small boats were now routinely fired on by the navy, and by toffs with shotguns, and by party members who had voted for the party for just such an opportunity.

On being elected, the party had adopted what it had tried to pretend was a 'Swiss-style' model of gun ownership. However, to no one's great surprise, this had swiftly degenerated into a USA-style cult of pro-gun rights. Consequently, American-style massacres were now normalised in Britain, too. And picking off migrants was – if not legalised – then viewed favourably by the authorities.

Homelessness had finally been solved, claimed the propaganda. In truth, homeless people had been rounded up and forced to work in labour-but-not-Labour Party camps, without concern for any physical or mental health issues that may have arisen after sleeping rough. They were paid zero-hour wages and housed in ramshackle huts without heating, other than any scrap wood they could forage and burn themselves. For all eco-friendly measures were now scrapped, with wind farms and solar powers ritualistically burnt publicly, under the surveillance of chain-smoking, gas-guzzler-driving party activists.

Defying the 10pm curfew was now a capital offence and hangings were commonplace, now that the noose was restored as state punishments for civic disobedience.

The technology that allowed the sales of pre-loved orgasms was owned by moguls like Leon Skum, an anagram of the billionaire entrepreneur whose foreign origins had been conveniently ignored by the ruling party, in contravention of its own rules.

Other examples of creeping Americanisation contrary to the flag-waving regime's stated 'Britain First' policies were evident, though pointing out hypocrisy was likely to get you a trip to the gallows.

The Big Issue had been banned and the Pavement magazine had been renamed the Sidewalk by its new, American owners. Now that “filthy beggars” had been removed from Britain’s streets, it now ignored homelessness issues and concentrated on pumping out pro-MAGA propaganda to those whose hands it was forced into on the streets. Failure to take a copy resulted in a week in the stocks for first offenders, then public hangings for any who resisted.

The resistance itself was comprised mostly of former editors, deputy editors, cartoonists, feature writers and scribblers of absurdist time-travel tales, who printed and distributed Resist! pamphlets from underground safehouses, and sought to sabotage the despotic state by blowing up right-wing munitions dumps and derailing troop trains, like the French Resistance of World War Two (but much more heroically and without berets, obvs).

Perhaps most heroic of all was the ‘fearless’ (it says here) satirist who lampooned the ruling party as Deform UK! Yup, that’d show ‘em! He was captured, but bravely never betrayed his fellow resistors, even under torture, and not because the befuddled fool couldn’t remember their names. Ahem!

Knowing he would never tell them anything, the state decided to make an example of him and he was – you guessed it – publicly hanged.

The black marketeer who O’Haggis had seen in The Ejaculatorium on his arrival in 2032 operated illegally, and ran the risk of having all profits confiscated by the state, before being publicly hanged in a town square or former charity shop.

The latter had all been firebombed on election night, as with help centres for immigrants, disabled people, LGBTIQA+ people and other minority groups, who were now all fair game for party members to shoot out of hand.

O’Haggis had been sent to 2032 to conduct a feasibility study for his employers. The Chronology Protection Agency™ wanted to know if it was worthwhile preventing this dystopia from happening. Would it, they wondered, fall apart swiftly due to infighting between members of its ruling elite? Would common sense (or at least the modicum thereof that we accept as normal today, pre-2029) return after the far-right revolution had burned itself out? If so, how high would the death toll be, and was that acceptable ‘collateral damage’? Or must it be thwarted before it even began?

If the electorate knew now what they’d really be voting for, then would they still elect their own oppressors? If they were given a glimpse into that future, would British voters retain enough integrity to alter its tragic course down the sewers of nationalism that O’Haggis witnessed in 2032?

We can only hope.
